Ever wondered why your dog won't stop barking at the neighbour? Want to know why your cat wakes you early up by clawing at your face, every morning? You're about to be given the answers.

That's because technology allowing you to speak to your pets is soon to hit the high street. Yes, really.

An Amazon commissioned report, which coincided with the launch of its Shop The Future online store, revealed communication devices which can understand and translate noises such as woofs and miaows will soon be on the shelves.

The report features several weird and wacky predictions for the future, by Anne Lise Kjaer of Kjaer Global and William Higham of Next Big Thing, with Higham commenting at the launch: "Pet-translator devices may help us get to know our dogs and cats better". It's hard to disagree.

And also included on the list of inventions set to be sent from the future are fridges which order your groceries when you're low on stock, and fitness trackers so small they can be embedded in your body.

But as yet there are no predictions as to when we'll be able to get our hands on the pet translators, giving us plenty of time to think up the millions of questions we've got for our furry friends.
